In the students' essays I found that they did an excellent job at mentioning the specific points about poetry, genres, and factors that go along with them. Along with mentioning the information I also think they did a great job at explaining what each concept and aspect was. I personally think they could have formatted the information differently rather than just stating information. The information was kind of just placed randomly I thought, but other than that I thought the essays were well thought and written. Both essays used "Navigating games", Sean Glatch (personal interview), Project: split, and "Discourse communities and Communities of Practice" as their sources for writing the essay. They had all the same information because of the same sources they used, so nothing was different.
