From my writing experience, I describe myself as a fairly decent writer. I have been writing papers since freshman year of high school. I feel comfortable and confident in my writing ability, so I do not have any problems with completing a paper. I felt success when I learned how to write a proper paper and that I knew I did with the first A I received. I was so proud of myself that I could write my personal thoughts and emotions while still matching that information to the given prompt I had to follow. I am not a perfect writer so I would like to work on figuring out how to start my papers. The one thing I really struggle with is trying to figure out where in the world to start. Before writing a paper I go back and forth with how to start. I also want to work on trying to get my thoughts down in writing. I struggle with how to word my thoughts and translate them to paper. I know what I want to say. It is how I want to say them and what sounds best. One thing I would like my instructor to know about my learning style is that I have a reading comprehension disorder which makes my thought process much slower compared to others. When I read something it takes me a little bit to really understand what it is trying to say, so when it comes to writing I tend to struggle in this area as well.
